ODORS LIKED AND DISLIKED

Wide Variety of "Tastes" in Smells With Which Every Person is Well Acquainted.

When 63 barrels of wine were emptied recently into New York gutters a crowd of 700 people stopped to watch—and sniff.

The bouquet of wine is one of the few odors which are appreciated by almost every one. Others are the smells of new-mown grass, coffee, spices, bacon, hot buttered toast, seaweed and, of course, most perfumes and all fruits and flowers.

Kings and beggars alike have commented on the ecstasy to be obtained from the odors of cooking. Curiously enough, this is largely due to the fact that smelling and tasting "overlap."

The "taste" of tobacco is often due to sight rather than either taste or smell. There is not half the enjoyment to be obtained from smoking in the dark as in the light. Blind men usually prefer stronger tobacco than those who can watch the curling smoke. Some use tobacco strongly scented.

Incredible as it may seem, there are people, too, who cannot even distinguish between tea and coffee when their eyes are shut.

Tastes differ because the pleasures derived from smells differ in almost every individual. Some like the smell of tar; others hate it. Some revel in the smell of a bonfire; others deliberately avoid it.

There are a host of other smells which to some are a delight and to others unpleasant. Among these are camphor, musk, creosote, carbolic, furniture polish, fresh paint, petrol fumes and the musty odors of old books.

GET FREE MEDICAL SERVICE

All Seamen Have a Right to Treatment by Radio While They Are on the High Seas.

The far-flung cry for help—"S. O. S."—has long since, even before the World war, focused the attention of peoples the world over on how wireless has tremendously lessened the dangers that befall men who go down to the sea in ships. Few, however, even the master mariners, realize as yet that all seaman have a right to medical service by radio while at sea.

Surgeon General H. S. Cumming of the public health service emphasizes that "even the expense of calling the service by radio from away out at sea is borne by the radio companies, without expense to ship or sailor." This medical service is really a sort of subsidy to merchant ships and sailors. A century and a quarter ago, when congress established the public health service, under the title of the marine hospital service, it directed it to render medical aid to every American seaman who applied for it, and that for this each seaman should pay 20 cents a month. This was in 1798. In 1870 the tax was doubled. In 1888 it was abolished. Since then all such aid has been rendered free.

John McGraw's assertions that the heavy hitting in the National league this season is due to the infusion of new blood is hardly borne out by the official averages, which show that a good majority of the leading batsmen are veterans of the game

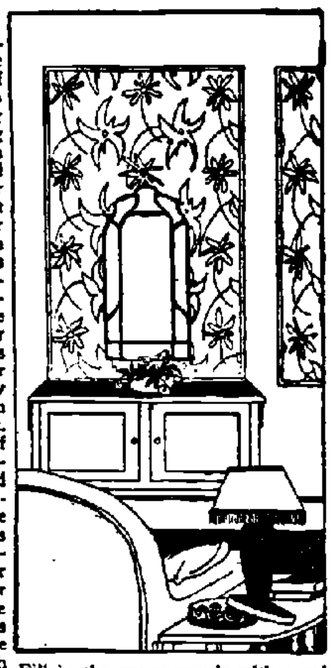
Moulding As Decorative Aid
Structural Interest a Thing to Consider

By Edward H. Hall



MANY an otherwise uninteresting room has been made interesting by the use of mouldings, for while it is well to remember the rule of decorating construction, and not constructing decoration, mouldings are so much a part of successful decoration and the range of their possibilities for decorative purposes so great that they may well be considered under the head of decoration rather than under that of construction. It is perhaps unfortunate that many decorators have thought mouldings belonged more to the sphere of the architect, cabinet-maker, carpenter or upholsterer, and this view has been the cause of the decorator missing many a golden opportunity to transform a plain barn-like room into a thing of beauty and interest. As a medium for the breaking up of ungainly, tiresome and commonplace rooms into concentrated spaces of interest, give me mouldings. Mixed with brains and the many truly decorative wall papers so suited for panel effects the decorator and home-maker have at their command an unlimited means for varied effects. There comes to the writer many successful treatments applied to the ordinary home by the use of mouldings, some of which are worthy of mention. We say ordinary home, because the extraordinary home will take care of itself, where the architect has usually provided it with structural accessories for decorating, or rather the architect has seen to it that the extraordinary house is finished in more careful detail than is the ordinary home, many of which are built without the careful architectural supervision given to the more expensive residence. Here is the decorator's opportunity, who, if he is not an absolute Rip Van Winkle will glory in this opportunity to provide the means whereby he can make ungainly spaces interesting and created for his client something original, and for himself a means for the proper distribution of color for which the plain stretch of blank wall is often unsuited. Mouldings need not be plain for there are many patterns offered running the entire gamut from plain to the most ornamental period.

Fill in the upper panels with a colorful paper, a tapestry or stencilled design, and cover the ceiling or plain spaces with plain paper. Tint the moulding with the tone of the plain paper. If you are careful of your color treatment you will have a striking room.

Give the Room Distinction

The first aim of the decorator is to give a room the character of distinctiveness. This does not mean that it must be an expensive decorative scheme, nor need the room be a large one, neither is the task a difficult one. The essential is knowledge! Knowledge comes to us through many channels; study and thought, careful and keen observation, and travel are the means for obtaining suggestions and for those who possess the means of the first two and are denied the means of travel we are going to give the opportunity to learn something of the possibilities that lie in the use of the things near at hand for the beautifying of their homes.

In the ordinary home the wall usually consists of a baseboard at the bottom (generally a very ugly and unfinished thing(door-frames, window-frames, and sometimes a strip of moulded wood at the top of the room. This arrangement is repeated in a million homes in the same tiresome way until it becomes monotonous and the soul of the home-maker cries out in despairing appeal "Give me liberty, or give me death," the latter in many cases being preferred. Suppose, however, the decorator steps in with the necessary knowledge and the confidence of the home-owner (which is absolutely essential) and places a moulding around the room, horizontally of course, 30 inches from the floor; this moulding should be flat with beveled edges, with possibly a groove or two running through the center; then on the upper wall he places vertical strips, one and one-half inches wide, six to nine inches from each corner of the room with two strips in the center of the space left if the space is a large one, placing these vertical strips as far apart from each other as the former strips are from the corner or door or window frame, and from these place horizontally connecting strips the same distance from the three-inch strip first mentioned and from the ceiling moulding or cornice, mitering the corners. This gives the room a high base, or wainscot effect with panels above. Fill in the upper panels with a colorful paper, such as may be found among the tapestries or stenciled designed papers and cover the stiling or plain spaces with a plain paper either in the same tones as is the ground of the figured paper in the panels or a trifle darker, then tint the mouldings exactly the same color or tone as the plain part of your paper and you can imagine how much more interesting your room will be than if it was treated in just the ordinary way.

Another simple way to break up the monotony of too plain a room: We will suppose the walls of the room to be nine feet high and that the door frames are seven feet from the floor to the top of the frame; simply place a strip of wood with moulded edges on the wall around the room so that the top of the moulding comes three inches below the top of the door frame, or three inches below the top of the lowest opening, then place another strip around the room at the ceiling four inches wide, and one strip on the ceiling close to the strip on the wall, this strip to be two and one-half inches wide, the two strips thus placed close together will form a cornice; on the outer edges of both strips put a small half-round beading and in the angle where the two join put what is known as an angle bead, this will give your room an importance you had not dreamed of and will have added to it interest from an architectural point. Paper the ceiling with what is known as a plain brush tint in an ivory color and paint the cornice exactly like the ceiling. Paper the lower part of the wall with a well designed paper and fill in the space between the seven-foot rail and the cornice with a paper like the ground of the wall, paint the rail the color of the ground, use a plain rug and plain overdrapes, call in your friends and let them rejoice with you in the interesting transformation that you have made by the use of a few mouldings well placed. I wonder if you have missed being impressed with one detail of this scheme, viz., the painting of these various rails the same color as the ground upon which they rest. This is done for the purpose of giving the room a more interesting structural detail and not to add color to the room.

A Delightful Transformation

One room which has been treated with the addition of mouldings and which has thus been transformed into a very decorative and delightful rooms comes to mind and will be described because of its success. The owner of the room found herself one Christmas the owner of a beautiful grand piano of Louis the Fifteenth style, and a room to put it in of the nondescript type found in so many homes, with woodwork of the golden oak variety and plain, cold forbidding walls and ceiling without relief of any kind. The room was of the type that is the very pet aversion of the decorator; add to that the sight of the beautiful piano and you can possibly experience the feeling of nausea the decorator felt. The commission, however, was carte blanche, so the first thing to do was to place the piano rightly in the room. After this was decided the walls and ceiling was laid out for moulded panels. The ceiling received a moulding around it twelve inches from the wall, with rococo corners. A cornice was placed in the angle of the wall and ceiling, and the four corners of the room, that is, the spaces each side the corners, were paneled in small plain moulded wood stripes. In the center of the wall, or all the large spaces, panels were made with moulding of a design corresponding with the carving of the piano. The ceiling, all mouldings and the lovely (?) golden oak woodwork was finished in old ivory with plain paper on the ceiling and in the small panels and stiling, and flat paint on the woodwork. In the large panels was used a paper of French design (a floral in rococo style), the design being in bright colors on a jade ground, leaves of dark green interweaving with the beautiful pastel coloring of the flowers gave the right balance to the panels. A dark green plain rug was used and rose over-drapes with other small accessories to complete the room, the whole being a complete and appropriate setting for the beautiful piano and a comfort to the occupants. In the use of mouldings do not forget the nursery, for with the many papers for children's rooms mouldings can be used to great advantage.

The question naturally arises here—What about pictures? To which we answer, that pictures look better when hung in panels than in any other way. It seems to give them a special setting and an added interest.
